Jan Pearson is the sole shopkeeper at the Old Heber City train town. An out-of-the-way place to be, for him it is as near a perfect setting for exercising creativity as can be found on earth.

It was a long and arduous journey that finally plopped

Pearson in the high country of rural Utah, but personal conviction that he had to be an artist or nothing kept his eyes trained on the path regardless of ups, downs, poverty and scourge that is often the artist's lot.

Creativity, the 37-year-old master craftsman explained, is the only way and means for him.

The artist uses small blowtorch for metal work.

Craftwork includes leather, metals, ivory.

"It's what I have to offer. It's me. It's who I am, however awkward my fitting in is."

Pearson is his products. The urge to mesh ivory, wood, metals, glass, and leather into beautiful and functional pieces lights his fire.

Pearson believes having creativity as master of the soul rather than money as master is better. Money, after all, is only earthly.

"Rather than pursuit of money, it is development of my skills and craftsmanship (I concentrate on). That's got its own reward — a sense of fulfillment," he said.

The important thing to him is to develop and keep ahold of the uniqueness in his soul, which art reveals.

"What makes me accept failure and accept what I am doing is a belief that my life is the beginning of a long career and spiritual quest," he said. "The score cards for life here have to do with economic successes, but that's only one aspect — one I don't hold very important."

Pearson concedes the lack of materialism and focus on art could be due to an early childhood in the Bible Belt section of America, and an upbringing as a preacher's son.

"I'm sure that had a definite influence. It also made me seek alternatives to structured religion. It gave me a feeling for spirituality, but not in the structured sense — in art."

"I've often felt my work is my religion, my 'spiritual quest' — contributing to the environment and fellow man through my work," he said. "I've been on this quest ever since I was a little kid."

Pearson has been keeping shop in the now-deserted Heber village for almost four years. While the other old-fashioned stores sit vacant awaiting settlement of railroad ownership and management disputes in court, he taps, pounds, drills, polishes and carves the elements into artistic pieces, making as good a living as he can with tourists trickling in and a spattering of regular clients.

"I specialize in things that aren't normal services and my clients are generally the collector types from Florida and California," he said.

Along the way he has picked up a reputation for unique handcrafted tools and mechanized jewelry, such as belt buckles and bracelets containing secret compartments.

Meanwhile, to make a living he has diversified, using his chaotically comfortable shop to do repair jobs it's hard to find others to do — putting taps on tap dance shoes, for example, or repairing handmade gold and silver jewelry, or duplicating antique gun parts.

"Pretty much anything that has to do with creativity and repair, I do it," he said. "It's a shop
